

Women are dramatically underrepresented in American policing.

Women make up only 12% of all law enforcement officers, and 3% of police leaders.

Equity matters: when certain segments of the population aren't represented, trust in law enforcement suffers.

Women approach the job from a different vantage point.

By building a diverse workforce, we're making both our departments and our communities stronger. We're examining and addressing issues that have undermined the integrity of our profession for far too long.

Women of color stand to play a particularly significant role in policing going forward.

Women can guide the profession in the direction of more community-focused policing.

Studies have shown that women in policing have low rates of police misconduct, use-of-force, and citizen's complaints, building trust and improving public safety.

Women in police leadership bring lived experience that makes a department more diverse and empathetic.

The Law Enforcement Action Partnership

Who We Are

The Law Enforcement Action Partnership is a 501(c)(3) nonprofit of police, sheriffs, judges, prosecutors, and other law enforcement professionals advocating for a new way of looking at the criminal justice system: employing innovative solutions and evidence-based best practices to make communities safer.

What We Do

Our more than 300 speakers connect with advocacy groups, policymakers, fellow law enforcement, the media, and the public at large, making the case for reform from a law enforcement perspective. LEAP works at the national and local levels to support bold criminal justice and drug policy changes.

We are rebuilding trust between police and communities; paving the way for more compassionate, ethical policing practices; and working toward public safety solutions that focus on the needs of the community.
